V. Reading Comprehension. (20%)

Every Sunday, Mark Bustos, 30, a hairstylist at Three Squares Studios, an elite salon in Chelsea, New York, that charges $150 to clients like Norah Jones, Marc Jacobs and Phillip Lim, hits the sidewalk and provides free cuts to the homeless.

Mr. Bustos often wanders around Union Square, the Lower East Side and Midtown. Other times, Mr. Bustos meets his unsuspecting new clients through friends and paying clients, who tell him about people in their neighborhoods. He does up to 10 haircuts a day.

He started offering haircuts to the homeless two years ago. The idea, he says, is to simply give back. "Whether I'm giving one at work or on the street, I think we can all relate to the haircut and how it makes us feel," Mr. Bustos said. "We all know what it feels like to get a good haircut."

In some way, Mr. Bustos, who lives in Jersey City, has always been generous about hairstyling, which he taught himself at a young age. A 2012 trip to the Philippines to visit family made him realize he could do more. He was struck by the number of impoverished children and decided to rent a barbershop as his way of helping. "It made me feel so good," Mr. Bustos said. "It was right to bring it home to New York." Since then, he has spent most Sundays in New York, styling the hair of the homeless.

Mark Bustos is not the only one who does so. Another barber in Australia, Nasir Sobhani, launched a project called "The Street Barber", which shows his "Clean Cut, Clean Start" mission as he skateboards through town to offer free haircuts to people who live on the streets.

The Melbourne resident's compassion for his "street clients" comes from his own battle from cocaine addiction. He said he used drugs to mask his hatred of himself, and now on his one off day a week he looks to provide some style and guidance to people on the street.

Both Mark's and Nasir's stories have inspired many. They both create Instagram accounts where they show their clients' photos and stories. Both accounts have become a place where people who believe in fundamental goodness of human beings can go to find stories, ideas, hope, community and inspiration in order to go out and serve in their own way.

"Just because they live on the street looking a little scruffy with their hair long doesn't mean they can't clean up and look great," Mark added. Similarly, Nasir commented, "A haircut can do so much for someone. That's why I name what I do 'Clean Cut, Clean Start'."

"A human interaction with them, companionship from someone who just genuinely wants
