1. Modern society, however, is large, open, multicultural and either secular or with a weak or mixed religious basis. Codes of conduct are weaker and more varied, and the effectiveness of social sanctions reduced by the scale and openness of society, the frequency of intermittent relations, and constant interaction with strangers.
2. Modern industrial society was made possible by two key institutions: the mass production assembly line and bureaucracy. These institutions made it possible to process huge numbers of products and huge numbers of people, using centrally controlled standardized routines. They were highly effective, but they sharply reduced individual autonomy. These hierarchical, centrally controlled institutions are becoming less acceptable in Postmodern society.
